Contemporary Paintings, Modern Art, Abstract Paintings - What's the Difference?

This is the basic question, along with a little confusing to answer because the terms "contemporary," "modern," and "abstract" can be utilized interchangeably occasionally. Let us focus on "modern art." Modern art is a classification of an art period that started around 1870 by Impressionists like Claude Monet. It is thought see it here that modern artists are the ones who tried out new strategies to seeing, expressing new ideas and techniques. But technically the current art movement ended throughout the 1960's and 70's when the term "postmodern" began to be used and pop art took over as the new thing.

Abstract art can be a kind of painting a departure from reality and was definitely modern at the time. Abstraction in paintings began to increase the risk for scene about one time modern art became known since it is a painting style classified nowadays in this art movement. But dreaded abstract paintings really started appearing early 1900's in Europe through the likes of Pablo Picasso while others inside the cubism movement. Abstract art actually was not created in America until the 1940's within the abstract expressionism movement with Jackson Pollock on the helm. Because abstract art is really a style of painting and not a classification of an art period, abstract paintings continue to be created today.

And that brings us to at this time. Today we make use of the term "contemporary" to define artwork to made in our lifetime or in the current present moment. So any paintings being created right now are contemporary paintings it doesn't matter what the design. What has happened is the fact that people generally use "contemporary art" to describe artwork from your 1970's until recently. It is actually difficult, or even near impossible to define a period when we're surviving in it. One might wonder, will any of us use the phrase "contemporary" to describe the artwork being made in the existing moment? Or could there be Boca Raton painting a stop towards the technique word "contemporary" signifying a conclusion of one other artwork period very much like how "modern" was used. I don't know. But in any case, I really hope these tips have helped and not confused you will more.
