

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Vexbook brings instant personal video consultations with accredited experts to your smartphone, tablet or PC.

How would you like to meet instantly face-to-face by video with any one of a multitude of world-leading authorities to discuss a matter of your own choosing? This is now surprisingly easy and affordable via Skype or Apple's FaceTime using a new video commerce platform, Vexbook.

Perhaps you could benefit from a consultation with Jo Hemmings, the regular Psychologist for British TV's Big Brother. Maybe some time with a leading card player would boost your poker winnings. Or you could talk to World beekeeping authority Michael Bush about your planned hives.

These are just three of the growing number of available experts on Vexbook's list who can help with everything from improving your relationships to learning Japanese, along with just about anything in between. And, unlike some other services, all the specialists on Vexbook have been identified or referred and personally interviewed by the company's management team or industry peers.

The real-time service offers opportunities that may until now have seemed out of reach geographically or financially. Thanks to Vexbook, time with a recognised specialist is available when you want it at a price that may be less than you expect.

The service is very easy to use. Time with experts is paid for at their agreed rate using Paypal, credit card or Bitcoin. You just use your normal Skype or FaceTime login for the video call. There is no proprietary software to install.

Vexbook's webapp provides a single page, comprehensive biography for each expert and indicates their ability. If they are available you can be talking to them in less than a minute, which is vital if you've got a problem that just won't wait. Otherwise if they aren't available at that moment, you can book a time that suits you.

Using Skype or FaceTime means Vexbook's service is available on just about any smartphone, tablet or computer. You can even take your expert with you. Imagine clothes shopping with your own personal stylist quite literally on hand.

There are Vexbook experts also on hand to deal with serious personal, crisis and family issues in addition to individual development, leisure and pastimes.

- Have you got an important interview coming up and you're not sure if you can cope? The author of a series of books and CDs on the "Art of Communication", Joanna Crosse, can coach you personally in preparation.
- Looking to revitalise your wardrobe? A session with Joanna Abouelata will show you how to develop your style using high street and designer fashion.
- Do you feel your career isn't quite going the way you want it to? Talking to career psychologist Sarah-Jane Thain could get you back on track or the push you need to make that change.

- Are you sometimes uncomfortable at a business or social event? Etiquette coach Denise Honaker can provide you with the confidence to deal with any formal situation.
- Do you find public presentations, pitches and speeches difficult? Training with the author of "The Gravitas Method" and TEDx presenter, Caroline Goyder could unlock that potential.
- What parent hasn't found themselves at their wit's end thanks to some seemingly intractable behaviour by their child? Through Vexbook you can often talk immediately to "Annie the Nanny", Anna Lussenburg, who'll help you modify those disruptive activities.
- Is the problem not your child, but your pet? There's an expert on hand for that too. Animal behaviourist Alana Stevenson can show you how to compassionately resolve your pet's problem behaviour.
- Do you feel you could do more for your health? Why not speak to Kristy Lee Wilson, Ms Fitness Universe 2013 or a Jopesh Agu, a nutritionist for the British Athletics team?

Vexbook's list keeps growing, from a chess master to leading authorities on antiques and interior design. You can even learn how to break a horse with John O'Leary. New names are being added daily with a target to recruit 2,000 leading experts by the end of this year.
